FOREWORD

The publication of an official concordance between the Canadian and the United States Standard Industrial Classifications is another in a series of cooperative projects undertaken by Statistics Canada and the U.S. Bureau of the Census. The concordance has been developed as an essential aid to users wishing to compare industrial data describing the economies of Canada and the United States. The comparability of industrial data depends both upon the way in which production activities are organized in each of the two countries, and also upon the principles and conventions used in the design of the Standard Industrial Classifications in which the data are presented by the two agencies. The concordance shows the relationship between the Industrial Classifications of the two countries and will lead to a better understanding of their respective industrial statistics.

PREFACE

This publication presents a concordance between the 1980 Canadian Standard Industrial Classification (SIC) and the 1987 United States Standard Industrial Classification (SIC).¹ The concordance was developed jointly by the U.S. Bureau of the Census and Statistics Canada. It identifies the differences between the two national SICs and provides a standard for relating establishment-based statistical data collected and published by the two countries, in terms of one or the other SIC.

This concordance represents the interpretation of the national SICs by the two statistical agencies. Together they have

- resolved questions regarding the precise content of the classes;
- reached agreement on the concordance of the 4-digit classes; and,
- assessed the relative importance of the existing differences between the two systems and identified those small enough to be ignored.

The concordance covers the entire field of economic activities, as do the two SICs. Because they have been designed with data users in mind, the concordance tables have been simplified by omitting differences considered to be statistically insignificant.

For detailed descriptions of industries and the underlying concepts used in the classifications, refer to the Standard Industrial Classification Manual, 1987,² for the United States, and the Standard Industrial Classification, 1980,³ for Canada. For supplementary information on the U.S. Bureau of the Census interpretation of the U.S. SIC, see the Numerical List of Manufactured and Mineral Products, 1987,⁴ and the Industry and Product Classification Manual, 1987.⁵ For further information on Statistics Canada's interpretation of the Canadian SIC see the 1980 SIC Coding Manual.⁶

INTRODUCTION

INTRODUCTION

Industrial classifications describe the industrial structure and composition of the economies for which they are designed. The industrial classifications of both Canada and the United States are designed for the compilation and analysis of statistics.

The SICs of the two countries for which this concordance has been developed have hierarchical structures of four levels. The number of classes at each level is:

	1987 US ¹ SIC	1980 Can SIC
Divisions (Letters)	11	18
Major groups (2-digit)	83	76
Industry groups (3-digit)	416	326
Industries (4-digit)	1005	860

Data published by the two countries are available at some or all of the four levels of the classifications.

COMPARISON OF THE STANDARD INDUSTRIAL CLASSIFICATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA

The basic classification principles and the concepts and criteria used by the two countries for the definition of industries are similar. The two SICs cover all economic activity in their respective countries. The unit to be classified is the establishment.

The two countries define the establishment similarly as an economic unit which is the smallest operating entity for which basic industrial data are available. Generally, an establishment is an economic unit at a single physical location where business is conducted, production takes place, or services are provided, for example a factory, mill, store, hotel, movie theatre, mine, farm, ranch, bank, sales office, warehouse, or central administrative office. For activities such as construction, transportation and similar physically dispersed operations, establishments are represented by main or branch offices, terminals, or the base from which personnel operate in carrying out these activities.

Specialization of production is the basis for the definition and delineation of industries. Industries are defined in terms of the primary activities of establishments. Because establishments often engage in numerous activities or produce a number of goods or services, specialization ratios, coverage ratios, and measures of economic significance are three criteria used to identify homogeneous groups of activities and create industries. For industries to reflect properly the activities being measured, the output of the industry has to consist mainly of the goods or services defining the industry and must account for the bulk of such goods and services provided by all establishments.

Though both classifications have these similarities, differences do exist. The concordance tables enumerate all of the statistically significant differences between the two classification systems. This section attempts only to identify and illustrate the major or most frequent reasons for differences between them.

Differences arise for various reasons. The two classifications reflect differences in the economic structures of the two countries, in the organization of production, and in the size of their markets. There are some differences in the application of classification principles and criteria for defining and grouping industries and there are differences that arise because each country emphasizes a different criterion.

Both countries have separate classifications for companies and enterprises. They differ from the establishment classifications. This concordance does not apply to them.

ECONOMIC STRUCTURE

An industrial classification is designed to reflect the structure of industry as it exists. Differences in the economic structures of the two countries, and in the organization of production, cause their respective classification systems to differ.

Organization of production and degree of specialization

The larger United States economy allows for greater specialization of production by establishments in the United States than by those in Canada that produce largely for the domestic market. For example, establishments manufacturing machinery in Canada are far less specialized than in the United States, which enables the United States to delineate many more machinery manufacturing industries.

Integrated manufacturing exists in both countries. The fact that identical products may be produced by specialized establishments and by integrated ones is recognized by both countries, but integrated industries can be delineated as separate industries more often in the United States than in Canada. The following illustrates the phenomenon. In the United States a plant which produces bacon is classified to Meat Packing Plants (2011), if the plant slaughters animals, and to Sausage and Other Prepared Meats (2013), if the plant processes purchased meat. In Canada this distinction is not made for reasons of size and coverage.² Only one bacon producing industry is delineated.

Differences in classification arise because of differences in the organization of production. For example, tire recapping and the repair of industrial machinery and equipment are classified to Wholesale Trade in Canada and Services in the United States. In Canada, these repair activities are mainly carried out as secondary activities of establishments primarily engaged in wholesale trade. Because of this, establishments which are primarily engaged in these repairs are also classified to the same industries within wholesale trade. In the United States there are a sufficient number of establishments primarily engaged in each activity to create separate industries.

Presence or absence of certain economic activities

Certain activities that exist in the United States are absent in Canada, because of geographical and climatic differences. Cotton growing, alligator farms, and citrus fruit groves are illustrations. The activities are classified in the Canadian industry in which the activity would appear if it existed. As a consequence, the content of industries described identically may in fact be different.

CLASSIFICATION CRITERIA

The three relatively objective criteria that are used to delineate industries -- namely specialization, coverage, and economic significance--have been mentioned earlier. These are applied in both countries but there are differences in the thresholds chosen and in their application to different levels of the two classifications.

Homogeneity ratios

Both countries use the same definition of the homogeneity ratios of specialization and coverage. There are variations in their specific thresholds and their application. The required thresholds for Canada and the United States, respectively, were 70 percent and 80 percent for specialization, and 75 percent and 70 percent for coverage. The choice of thresholds in which the United States requires greater specialization while Canada requires greater coverage, is in itself a reflection of the degree of specialization to be found in the two countries.

² The United States permits lower coverage for these types of industries.

Although the two countries compute the ratios in roughly the same manner, there is at least one difference. Some manufacturing activity is performed both by units primarily engaged in manufacturing and by units that are primarily engaged in other activities. The United States calculations take account only of production by manufacturing establishments. For selected commodities, the Canadian calculations take account both of total production by manufacturing establishments and production as a secondary activity by wholesale establishments.

It is difficult to state what precise effect the differences in the ratios have on the systems. Whatever the effect, there probably would be moderate changes in industry detail without any significant effect on the classification structure.

Economic significance

The homogeneity ratios limit the industry detail to some extent. In addition, other considerations make it essential that a limit be established below which the system does not discriminate further but instead groups units. In the industry classifications, this limit is established by the economic significance criterion. The United States system defines this criterion in terms of number of establishments, employment, payroll, value added and volume of business (value of shipments or receipts). The Canadian system limits itself to gross output (sales, value of shipments or revenues), the equivalent to the United States volume of business. Both countries require greater economic significance to add a new industry than to retain an existing one.

In general, proposed new industries must meet each of the criteria of economic significance, specialization and coverage. However, industries that substantially exceed one or two of the criteria and fall slightly short of the others may be accepted in some cases. For example, industries which are not yet large enough but are growing rapidly may be accepted on the basis of current size and evidence of expected growth by a specific time. Proposed industries which meet the criteria only marginally also need to show substantial growth and the likelihood of future growth.

Application of classification criteria

The two countries have their own histories and ways of applying classification criteria to create groups and industry classes in their classifications. The range of activities is very similar, but the way in which each country groups them differs in some instances. The criteria of specialization, coverage, and economic significance do not always determine how activities are classified or grouped, especially at the higher levels in the United States classification.

One clear example is that of logging. Both the United States and Canadian systems provide separate industries for logging and for other forestry activities. The industries involved are much the same in both countries. Yet the United States groups logging at the broad level with manufacturing, and Canada groups logging with other forestry activities.

Fish farming is another example. The United States classifies fish farming as agricultural production and Canada classifies it as fishing even though the industries are much the same. The Canadian interpretation places greater emphasis on the similarity of final products while the United States emphasizes similarity of the inputs and operations to those of farms rather than of fishing. The United States decision may also have been influenced by the early development of the activity on farms.

The Canadian system applies specialization and coverage criteria to all levels of the classification, unlike the United States which uses these criteria largely for questions of detail and then only within Manufacturing. As a consequence, some Canadian Divisions group industries providing products and services related to one another. In particular, grouping industries primarily engaged in retail sales with other industries primarily engaged in providing services. Two examples are the retail sale of and services to motor vehicles; and restaurants and drinking places with hotels.

Both the United States and Canada provide separate industries for establishments primarily engaged in the retail sale of motor vehicles and for those primarily engaged in repairing or providing other services to such vehicles. At a higher level, the United States groups industries primarily selling motor vehicles with other industries primarily in Retail Sales, and those primarily providing motor vehicle repair and other services with other industries in Services. Canada, on the other hand, groups motor vehicles sales and services at the higher level within the Retail Trade Division. This approach maximizes both specialization and coverage at the higher level, since industries engaged primarily in sales often provide significant services and those engaged primarily in providing services often have some level of sales of vehicles, especially used vehicles.

Although other factors may also be important, the same general treatment is provided for restaurants and drinking places and places providing accommodation. Both countries have essentially the same basic distinctions, with some differences in detail. But again Canada groups these activities at the higher level because of overlaps for establishments providing both sales and services. The United States groups restaurants and drinking places with Retail Sales and accommodation with Services. In this case, it is also possible to interpret restaurants as providing services rather than sales.

Although the United States does not group these related sales and service establishments, both agencies recognize the problems caused by the combinations of activities provided. Special interpretations are adopted, such as classifying new car dealers as retail even if their receipts from repairs are larger or classifying hotels as accommodation even if their receipts from sale of meals or beverages are larger.

In the Canadian SIC, all lumber and building materials dealers, fuel oil dealers and computer stores are classified to Wholesale Trade, whether or not they also sell to retail customers. In the United States these activities are classified in either retail or wholesale trade. Lumber and building materials dealers that sell to both classes of customer are classified in Retail Trade. Fuel oil dealers and computer stores which sell to both classes of customer are classified to either Wholesale or Retail Trade on the basis of the primary class of customer.

There are a number of government programs that are treated as part of public administration in the United States but in Canada they are classified in other industries. Examples are the workers compensation programs which are classified in Insurance Services and the administration of government operated lotteries which is classified in Amusement Services. In the Canadian system, these programs are so administered that they are regarded as being comparable to similar services that are provided privately.

OTHER CONSIDERATIONS

In the United States SIC, industries are required to have a sufficient number of companies so that industry data can be published without disclosing information about the operation of individual firms. In Canada this factor is taken into consideration at the time of data release.

Classification revision in the United States makes a point of assessing the merits of proposed changes against the cost to the government as well as the cost and burden to the business community that supplies data to the government. In Canada these factors are taken into account through survey methodology.

In both countries, historical continuity in statistical series is an important consideration as is the identification of new or emerging industries.

CONCORDANCE TABLES AND EXPLANATORY NOTES

The concordance tables between the Standard Industrial Classifications of the United States and Canada are presented in both sequences. Additional information is provided in the explanatory notes to assist users in understanding the relationships between the four-digit classes of the two classifications.

CONCORDANCE TABLES

The concordance is presented in the form of tables arranged in the sequence of each classification. Table 1 presents the concordance in the order of the domestic classification. Table 2 presents the concordance in the order of the other classification. The concordance tables display the corresponding classes for all levels of the two classifications.

The concordance is presented in division sequence in the numerical order of the classification shown on the left. Each concordance table starts with the first division of that classification with the divisions of the other classification which correspond to it, in whole or in part, shown beside it on the right hand side.

For other levels, the concordance table shows the corresponding two-digit codes that match to a major group on the left hand side and the corresponding three- or four-digit codes that match a group or an industry within that major group.

When the concordance relates one class on the left to only part of a class on the right, it is denoted by an asterisk on the right hand code. (Note that statistically insignificant links have been omitted from these concordance tables.)³

The tables of this document use a series of short titles for both classification systems. These titles are used as a matter of convenience and in no way alter the classification coverage of the classes they describe.

Illustrations

A class of the classification on the left can be exactly equal to one class in the other classification, in which case, only one class of the other country's classification appears.

Example:

Canadian SIC	US SIC
0115 Sheep & Goat Farms	0214 Sheep & Goats
US SIC	Canadian SIC
0214 Sheep & Goats	0115 Sheep & Goat Farms

A class of the classification on the left can be greater than a single class of the other classification. In this instance, more than one class appears on the right, opposite the one class of the classification on the left.

Example:

Canadian SIC	US SIC
0211 Veterinary Services	0741 Veterinary Services for Livestock 0742 Veterinary Services, Specialties
US SIC	Canadian SIC
1752 Floor laying and Floor Work, nec	4277 Hardwood Flooring Installation 4278 Resilient Flooring and Carpet Work

If the class of the classification on the left covers only a part of a class in the other, the latter appears on the right with an asterisk (*) beside the code.

Example:

Canadian SIC	US SIC
0163 Nursery Products	0181* Ornamental Nursery Products
US SIC	Canadian SIC
0171 Berry Crops	0151* Fruit Farms

The most common instance is where the activities of one class from the classification on the left correspond to those in more than one class in the other.

³ The assessment of insignificance was made at the four-digit level. An assessment has not been made for the higher levels.

Example:

Canadian SIC	US SIC
0311 Salt Water Fishing Industry	0273* Animal Aquaculture 0912* Finfish 0913* Shellfish 0919* Miscellaneous Marine Products

Example:

Canadian SIC	US SIC
0231 Agric Management & Consulting Services	0751* Livestock Services, Exc. Veterinary 0762 Farm Management Services 0781* Landscape Counselling and Planning 8748* Business Consulting, nec

Example:

US SIC	Canadian SIC
2426 Hardwood Dimension and Flooring Mills	2512* Sawmill & Planing Mill Products Industry 2549* Other Millwork Industries 2699* Other Furniture & Fixture Industries, nec

Example:

US SIC	Canadian SIC
3291 Abrasive products	3099* Other Metal Fabricating Industries nec 3571 Abrasives Industry 3761* Soap & Cleaning Compounds Industry

The various elements of a given class in one system are sometimes found in classes that are quite distant from one another in the order and format of the other system. To find the other classes quickly, the user should turn to the second sequence. In the example for Canada class 0231, to find the remaining Canadian industries to which the United States class 8748 concords, the user should turn to the United States sequence. The user will find the corresponding Canadian SIC industries 0231, 7741, 7759 and 7799. In the example for the United States class 3291, to find the remaining United States industries to which the Canadian class 3761 concords, the user should turn to the Canadian sequence. The user will find the corresponding United States SIC industries 2841, 2842 and 3291.

Special cases

In a few Canadian industry cases, a decision was made to show no comparability with any United States class, because a whole series of United States classes would have had to be listed against each one of them. It would have created an unnecessarily long list of "split" classes that would have conveyed the fact that there is no comparable United States class. The statement "No Comparable U.S. Class" conveys the message more directly.

There are five such Canadian industry classes:

0159 Fruit & Vegetable Combination Farms
0171 Livestock & Crop Combination Farms
5981 General Merchandise, Wholesale
5992 Second-Hand Goods, Wholesale Exc.
Mach. & Auto
8276 Research Administration

In all these cases, the Canadian class appears in its proper place within the sequence of the Canadian SIC, with the statement "No Comparable U.S. Class" on the United States side. The Canadian class does not appear at all in the United States SIC sequence.

Data Comparability

The concordance tables indicate only the relationship between the two classifications. There are two ways of using the concordance tables to make data comparable.

One way is to aggregate classes of one or both systems to form groups that are comparable in scope. Often a relatively limited number of industries from one system can be added together to be reasonably comparable to a group of industries in the other. The following example illustrates a situation in which data comparability is obtained by grouping two Canadian classes and four United States classes to achieve analytical usefulness.

Canadian SIC	US SIC
4611 Natural Gas Pipeline Transport Industry	4922 Natural Gas Transmission 4923* Gas Transmission and Distribution
4921 Gas Distribution Systems Industry	4923* Gas Transmission and Distribution 4924 Natural Gas Distribution 4932 Gas and Other Services Combined

This situation is acceptable because a reference to the table in United States sequence reveals that the United States 4923 is completely (or at least acceptably) covered by Canadian 4611 and 4921.

The second way is to estimate statistical proportions for classes which relate to more than one category.

In both types of cases, the user may also make additional assessments of the level of comparability, since an overlap that is significant at the 4-digit level may not be at aggregated levels.

EXPLANATORY NOTES

Traditional concordance tables usually stop short of informing users of the specific items that cause the relationship (or link) between two classes. They only point to the classes that have at least one type of economic activity in common. It is left to the user to scan the respective definitions and lists of items in the two classifications to identify the economic activities that are responsible for the partial relationships, namely the classes that are characterized here with an asterisk in the concordance tables.

This section of the publication is a subset of the concordance table. It lists only those industry classes to which the industry in question partially relates. The complete classes to which it relates are not shown in these notes. The industry is shown on the left with its own class title. On the right the class codes of industries to which it partially relates are listed with a description of the specific activities or products which correspond. In cases where the list of items would be very long, generic descriptions have been used.

In the example given above where the concordance is:

Canadian SIC	US SIC
0163 Nursery Prods.	0181* Ornamental Nursery Products

the explanatory notes provide the user with more precise information on the relationship between the two classes. The information is presented as follows:

1980 Canadian	87 US	Activities-Items
0163 Nursery Prods.	0181*	Nursery grown flowers, shrubs, bedding plants and sod

The same presentation is used in the case of a class in one classification which partially relates to many classes, in the other. For example:

1987 United States	1980	Activities-Items
0751 Livestock Services, Exc. Veterinary	0212*	Cattle, hog, sheep and goat breeding services
	0213*	Poultry breeding services
	0219*	Cattle, hog, sheep and goat farming services except breeding
	0231*	Livestock breeding consulting services

It should be noted that, in this example, each of the individual activities that explain the relationship between United States SIC 0751 and Canadian SIC 0219 are not listed, rather a generic description has been used with exceptions.

Where one SIC class relates perfectly to one or many class(es) and partially to one or many class(es) of the other classification, the explanatory notes only provide information on the partial relationship(s). In the following example where the concordance is:

Canadian SIC	US SIC
4611 Natural Gas Pipeline Transport Ind.	4922 Natural Gas Transmission 4923* Gas Transmission and Distribution

The explanatory notes only explain the partial relationship as follows:

1980 Canadian	87 US Activities-Items
4611 Natural Gas Pipeline Transport Ind.	4923* Combined distribution and transmission of natural gas, primarily transmission

The user should therefore be careful not to use the explanatory notes in place of the concordance table(s); this section of the publication should be seen as a complement to the concordance table(s) by those who wish to gain a greater understanding of the relationship between the two classifications.

INTRODUCTION

The more detailed examination of both the Canadian and American Standard Industrial Classifications undertaken during the project to concord both these classifications and the European Union (NACE) to the International Standard Industrial Classification, (ISIC Rev3), resulted in changes to the concordance between the Canadian and U.S. SIC's.

These errata are set up in the same format as the Canada-U.S. Concordance i.e.: tables that give the 1980 Canadian links to the 1987 U.S. SIC and the inverse in U.S. SIC order with links to the Canadian SIC. These are followed by notes which explain the partial relationships shown in the tables as indicated by asterisks. The explanatory notes are also displayed in both Canadian and U.S. SIC order.

The amendments to the concordance are shown by utilizing letters as displayed in the legend. The table in Canadian SIC order gives the changes to be made to the U.S. SIC links, similarly the table in U.S. SIC order gives the changes to the Canadian links.

This document contains the changes to the Concordance (Catalogue number 12-574) which was released in February 1991.

The legend below indicates the type of change which should be made to the original tables.
